TECHNOLOGY

Video game helps with fire drill

Researchers at Durham University have modified a video game and turned it into a fire drill simulator.

The team used The Source Engine, the 3D game engine used to drive Half-Life 2, and created a virtual model of one of the university's departments.

Developers plan to use it to examine people's behaviour in a fire and to train people in good fire practice.

The simulator can be adapted to mimic the interior of most buildings, although modification will be needed.

Durham University's Dr Shamus Smith, who helped spearhead the project, told BBC News that that while bespoke 3D modelling software was available, modifying a video game was faster, more cost effective, and had better special effects.

"The video you see is an example of how to escape the Computer Science Department of Durham University.

"We were interested in using game technology over a customised application and The Source Engine, from Half-Life, is very versatile.

"We used the simulation to see how people behaved in an actual fire situation and to train people in 'good practice' in a fire.

Know-how

The team at Durham say the virtual environment helped familiarise people with evacuation routines and could also help identify problems with a building's layout.

By customising a video game, a finished representation of a building could be completed in just a few weeks without needing to learn or develop additional programming skills.

However, while the simulation worked for most people, those who played a lot of video games did rather unusual things.

"If a door was on fire, they [gamers] would try and run through it, rather than look for a different exit," said Dr Smith

Non-gamers treated it as a more serious exercise.

In other studies, gaming technology has also been adapted to simulate lab accidents, teach people about cooking safety, and to help people overcome arachnophobia.

Mobiles connect across the waves

The days of running off to sea to escape problems on land could be over as mobile connectivity hits the ocean.

Irish mobile maritime communications company Blue Ocean Wireless has teamed up with picocell developer ip.access to develop the system.

For crews, separated from their families for months on end, the ability to be able to make and receive calls from their mobiles will be a big boon.

Previously merchant ship crews had to rely on expensive satellite phones.

The new system will also rely on satellite communication. A picocell - a small base station that extends mobile coverage - will be installed in accommodation areas of the ship.

Connected to a remote gateway, it will convert a mobile call into a narrowband IP signal for transmission over the satellite network.

Picocells are increasingly being used to extend mobile coverage to places where exterior signals cannot penetrate, such as office buildings, ships and aircraft.

Air chat

UK-based ip.access has already done a series of deals which have put picocells onboard ferries and cruiseliners.

Extending the service to merchant ships will "bring the benefits of mobile cellular communication to seafarers who spend so much time away from friends and family," said ip.access chief executive Stephen Mallinson.

Typically such picocells are used by mobile operators on 'terra firma' to boost indoor network coverage in buildings and for business customers in offices.

But anywhere where traditional GSM coverage is difficult could potentially be a candidate for using picocells.

British Airways has announced that it will be using picocells on planes from the autumn.

It will enable air passengers to send and receive text messages and access the internet using a smartphone or GSM-enabled laptop but BA is stopping short of allowing voice calls.

Australia's selectors have been spared an 11th-hour selection dilemma, with the paceman Peter Siddle expected to recover from a heavy fall in Wednesday's domestic one-day game between Victoria and South Australia. Andrew Hilditch's panel will announce a 14-man squad on Thursday for the three-Test series in South Africa, and Siddle is expected to be named alongside Mitchell Johnson, Doug Bollinger and Ben Hilfenhaus.

Those plans appeared in jeopardy when Siddle, making his return from a foot injury that sidelined him from Australia's one-day international series, fell awkwardly in the field and completed only seven overs for Victoria. Siddle said after the South Australia innings that he was not seriously injured - "I'm just bugged" - and would be available for national selection.

That came as a major relief to Hilditch and his fellow selectors, who are already missing Brett Lee (ankle) and Stuart Clark (elbow) ahead of a series in which South Africa will challenge them for the No. 1 ranking. Matthew Hayden's recently vacated opening post looms as the most contentious decision. Phil Jaques posted a century in his last Test innings and has a highly respectable 902 runs from his 11 matches, but is facing a strong challenge from his New South Wales team-mate Phillip Hughes.

Hughes, 20, capped a brilliant 2008 campaign by being named the Bradman Young Cricketer of the Year at Tuesday's Allan Border Medal ceremony. He has been in sublime touch for the Blues all season, and did his chances of a maiden Test call-up no harm with 151 and 82 not out in the Sheffield Shield match against Tasmania.

Ricky Ponting, the Australia captain, set the stage for an intriguing selection showdown by calling on Hilditch's panel to name only one opener to partner Simon Katich. "I don't reckon [the selectors] will pick two openers," Ponting said. "I think they should make their mind up now and pick whoever they think is going to be the best selection for South Africa and possibly for the Ashes tour as well.

"Phillip [Hughes] has done absolutely everything in his power to give himself the best chance to be picked. His record for New South Wales in the last couple of years has been outstanding ... [and] obviously one thing in Phil [Jaques'] favour is his Test experience and his Test record behind him.

He did nothing wrong in the games he played when he came into the side and he made a hundred in his last game."

The selectors must also decide whether to call-up two spinners - most likely Bryce McGain and Nathan Hauritz - or just the one. McGain is considered the front-runner among the slow bowlers, but at 36, and with no Test experience, he represents a considerable gamble. Hauritz provides a sound defensive option, and drew praise from his state captain Katich after six wickets for New South Wales against Tasmania.

The suspension of Andrew Symonds and injury to Shane Watson should result in the Victoria allrounder Andrew McDonald holding his place, although the incumbent one-day allrounder James Hopes could apply pressure. Symonds, meanwhile, will be named on Thursday in Queensland's one-day and four-day sides to play Victoria and South Australia, respectively, and faces a steep climb to reclaim his Test place ahead of the Ashes series.

While Australia's selectors contend with injuries and suspension, Mike Procter's South Africa panel have been buoyed by the news that Graeme Smith and Ashwell Prince are well advanced in their recoveries and will be available for the first Test in Johannesburg from February 26. Mickey Arthur, the coach, said Smith was recovering well from the torn elbow tendon that inconvenienced him for the majority of 2008.

"He has had the second blood injection in his elbow, and the experts say he is ahead of schedule," Arthur said. "He met us upon our return to South Africa and seems very confident that he will be right to play the first Test."
