Small cars get poor marks in collision tests

Fuel-efficient, affordable mini cars may not be as safe as larger vehicles

This handout photo provided by the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety shows a 2009 Toyota Yaris after the Institute's 40-mph frontal offset crash.

Micro cars can give motorists top-notch fuel efficiency at a competitive price, but the insurance industry says they don't fare too well in collisions with larger vehicles.

In crash tests released Tuesday, the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety found that drivers of 2009 versions of the Smart "fortwo," Honda Fit and Toyota Yaris could face significant leg and head injuries in severe front-end crashes with larger, mid-size vehicles.

"There are good reasons people buy mini cars. They're more affordable, and they use less gas. But the safety trade-offs are clear from our new tests," said Adrian Lund, the institute's president.

Automakers who manufacture the small cars said the tests simulated a high-speed crash that rarely happens on the road. They also said the tests rehashed past insurance industry arguments against tougher fuel efficiency requirements. The institute has raised questions about whether stricter gas mileage rules, which are being developed by the government, might lead to smaller, lighter vehicles that could be less safe.

"If you were to take that argument to the nth degree, we should all be driving 18-wheelers. And the trend in society today is just the opposite," said

Dave Schembri, president of Smart USA.

Sales of small cars soared when gas prices topped $4 per gallon last year but have fallen off as gasoline has retreated to about $2 a gallon and the economic downturn has slowed car sales. The small cars are affordable — prices of the three cars tested range from about $12,000 to $18,000 — and typically achieve 30 miles per gallon or more.

The tests involved head-on crashes between the fortwo and a 2009 Mercedes C Class, the Fit and a 2009 Honda Accord and the Yaris and the 2009 Toyota Camry. The tests were conducted at 40 miles per hour, representing a severe crash.

In the fortwo collision, the institute said the Smart, which weighs 1,808 lbs, went airborne and turned around 450 degrees after striking the C Class, which weighs nearly twice as much. There was extensive damage to the fortwo's interior and the Smart driver could have faced extensive injuries to the head and legs. There was little damage to the front seat area of the C Class.

Schembri said the test simulated a "rare and extreme scenario" and noted that the fortwo had received solid ratings from the government's crash test program. The fortwo has received top scores from the Insurance Institute in front-end and side crash tests against comparably sized vehicles but in the front-end tests against the C Class, the institute gave the mini car poor marks.

In the Fit's test, the dummy's head struck the steering wheel through the air bag and showed a high risk of leg injuries. In the vehicle-to-vehicle test, the Fit was rated poor while the Accord's structure held up well.

Honda spokesman Todd Mittleman said the tests involved "unusual and extreme conditions" and noted that all 2009 Honda vehicles had received top scores from the Insurance Institute.

In the Yaris test, the institute said the mini car sustained damage to the door and front passenger area. The driver dummy showed signs of head injuries, a deep gash on the right knee and extensive forces to the neck and right leg.

The Yaris has received good ratings in past front and side testing but received a poor rating in the crash with the Camry. Toyota spokesman John Hanson said the car-to-car test had little relevance to consumers because of its severity.

"It's fairly obvious that they have an agenda here with regard to how smaller cars are going to be entering the North American market in larger numbers," Hanson said.

West Indies players set for big pay hike

Players contracted the IPL will be mitigated against any loss of earnings

In a significant change from the recent disputes over payments, the West Indies Cricket Board (WICB) has announced a pay hike of significant proportions to the national players. The board did not reveal any figures but the Trinidad and Tobago Express has reported that the 20 players bound for the England tour next month will receive US$1.5 million between them as against the usual figure of $250,000-$300,000.

“The WICB has offered a significantly higher payment to players, (over and above that which would normally have been paid on such a tour) including a special provision for contracted Indian Premier League players to mitigate against any loss of earnings,” the board said in its official website.

Chris Gayle and Fidel Edwards will participate in the early stages of the IPL before heading to England for the Test leg of the tour which starts first. Fast bowler Jerome Taylor was contracted to the Kings XI Punjab franchise but had to pull out due to injuries sustained in a motor accident. Allrounder Dwayne Bravo isn't part of the Test squad, which makes him available for the Mumbai Indians at least until the one-dayers start in England. The IPL players will be paid on a pro-rata basis by their respective franchises.

During the final stages of England's tour of the West Indies recently, the home side threatened to boycott the fifth and final ODI in St Lucia due to a pay dispute between the West Indies Players' Association (WIPA) and the WICB. The players were also reportedly unhappy that the board had agreed to the England tour without consulting them, since it clashes with the lucrative IPL.

In another significant development, the WICB has announced a pay hike of up to 300% for the first-class players. The paper reported that the players are set to earn between US$1,400 and $1,500 for a four-day match compared to the $300 they were receiving earlier.

“The WICB offered a revised package which included increases in new match fees of up to 300% on a tiered-basis according to seniority, provident fund provisions and retainer contracts,” the website quoted. “A compromise was reached, on a proposal from WIPA that only a flat match fee will be paid to players.”
